Hudson River School

The first American school of painting emerged between 1825 and 1875, during which time two generations of artists created a distinctive style of landscape painting that became a premier focus of art in the United States. This group of painters, who came to be known as the Hudson River school, set their sights on the discovery, exploration, and settlement of the land.

With the opening of the Wadsworth Atheneum in 1844, Daniel Wadsworth shared with the nation's public his longstanding interest in American art and culture. As a member of the first generation of American citizens—like many of the artists of his day—Wadsworth saw the young country's vast wilderness landscape as a symbol of its potential to become a great nation. The themes embraced by America's contemporary artists—the Hudson River school—defined his vision as a collector and a patron. His lifelong associations with its leading members, including Thomas Cole and Frederic Church, enabled Wadsworth to assemble one of the earliest and finest private art collections in the country.

It is with pleasure that we share these paintings with audiences across the United States.
